The hands-over-head (HOH) overheads (OHs) used in Olympic-style weightlifting are an efficient movement form that can produce a high score, but the depth of the hands to the ceiling is highly variable. The objectives of this study were to use position data of OH athletes to predict hands depth and, in a subsequent study, to validate the predictions using biomechanical measures. Sixteen male weightlifters performed 105 OHs. Hands depth was measured with a "Pedar foot drop X-ray" camera, while hand velocity was measured with a Vicon 3D motion capture system. All athletes were filmed from the side, and their OH time was measured. A multiple regression analysis with the Vicon and Pedar data was performed, and a prediction equation was derived. Hands depth was then predicted using this equation and compared with actual hand depth. Prediction of hand depth with the Vicon and Pedar data explained 72% and 77% of the variance, respectively. Actual hand depth was significantly less deep than predicted with both the Vicon and Pedar, with the average difference being 6 mm. Based on the results of this study, we conclude that estimating hand depth from OH athletes' position data may be a useful aid in coaching and competition.Q: Write table data to csv using SparkR I'm currently using SparkR in order to load data to R from a table in an Azure SQL Database.
