Which, depending on who you talk to, is either a genius move or a completely pointless move. Either way, we're going to leave your emotion at the door and talk about the reasons why you should or shouldn't be upset. Since we're all about the business, how about we start with where people like you as professionals fall down and what we can do to level you up. #1: You didn't take pictures Even if it's your third year, you should be taking pictures. I don't care if you're at a "casual" event or "going for it". Pictures are the best way to document both the process and your product. When I asked why you didn't have pictures of me, you said the didn't feel like they were in a social setting. That is a big problem that could have easily been solved by someone in this situation at your event. They say the first picture is the most important; you should have a lot of them. #2: You weren't telling people about your business Since you are giving away prints, it is even more important for you to tell people how your company works. When I asked you why you didn't give details to the people you were photographing, you said the people didn't really want to hear about the company. Since you're doing this for a living, you need to be visible to people who want to give you money. If no one knew how your company works, how could they trust you? #3: You didn't organize the event I understand that photography is hard work. I know that planning for your social media posts is tough. But there are a lot of free services available to help you organize things. If you've got an iPhone, then you can even do this on the go. Sending emails to people a few days before your event is also free. There are services that will give you an event calendar; and you can also add your post-event tweets to these services. Plus, you could hire someone to help with your social media too. Not only is it free, but this helps you out at other times of the year. Oh,
