Martin Luther King at Parkview Baptist Church on April 4, 1968 mp3 from gradation, Library of Congress. The global spread of a pathogen in a local livestock population has been modeled numerically by a mathematical model including infection, recovery, and death rates, a culling mechanism, and a spatial network representing the geographical connectivity of the farm units. The analysis of the long term outbreak dynamics in the farm network may give us a clearer insight about the basic processes of the spread of the pathogen and how this interplays with the culling mechanism. Further, a correct prediction of the course of the epidemic may be a first step for a timely decision in case of disaster and disease control measures. The local reproduction number is a key quantity characterizing the rate at which the disease spreads in the farm network. For small infectious contact numbers, the infection spreads locally, whereas for a larger number of contacts the infection spreads between the farm units, causing in this case a global outbreak. The value of the local reproduction number is relatively independent of the culling rate, and it depends on the rate at which infectious animals are removed from the infected farm and the rate at which susceptible farm animals are entered into the farm. Thus, the local reproduction number can be interpreted as the transmissibility of the infection between the farm units, and one can use this quantity to assess which farm population has the largest transmissibility. Our analysis of the global and local dynamics of the epidemic shows that the infection in the farm network is in most cases always in a local regime, i.e., the infection spreads within the farm units. The local regime is associated with a low culling rate and hence high infection load within each farm. If the culling rate is too low, the infection will propagate globally causing an outbreak in the whole farm network. If the culling is too high, the infection will be cleared from the farm units and therefore the infection load in the farm network will decrease. Our model framework allows us to derive realistic realistic values for the local reproduction number. The local reproduction number is relatively independent of the parameters describing e79caf774b
