It's an ambient house project from the project's website, and we've already heard tons of new music from Earphunk and Hyposmia in that time. A lot of that music has been produced by iLL Potensia, who has worked with Earphunk and Hyposmia in the past, and now we have an official release from her. This track is called "Toes," and it's a nice chill house track with a heavy bassline. The music blends smoothly together, and it's a welcome treat to our ears. iLL Potensia has already shared a handful of new tracks since last week's Rolling Loud, and she's putting out a bunch more on Tuesday. "Where We Go" is that one, and she'll follow it up with a few more releases later this week. Make sure to tune into iLL Potensia's Soundcloud in the coming days and weeks for more new music from Hyposmia and Earphunk!Q: UITableView in UITabBar I'm developing an app and I want to create a UITabBarController with 3 tabs, in one of the tabs I want to create a tableview. Q: Expression version of Function.Invoke I was testing something and noticed that System.Reflection.Emit.Function.Invoke(..) in the framework is not callable. Is there an expression version of Function.Invoke or a way to get at reflection on a function without using a delegate? I've dug into Reflector and actually, the type of the input parameter doesn't even extend System.Object so you can't use a cast: System.Reflection.Emit.Function.Invoke(Object obj) A: It turns out Function.Invoke() is an overload of Object.Invoke(). As it doesn't have a parameter for the object the type is limited to type Object. So, using that type can be sufficient: object r = System.Reflection.Emit.Function.Invoke(System.Reflection.Emit.TypeSystem.Object, null); A: This should do the trick: Delegate createDelegate(object targetObject) this is the version of Function.Invoke() that System.Reflection.Emit.Function provides. Calling it is relatively easy: var method = (Action)createDelegate(typeof(Action)); method(); If you wish, you can use an expression tree instead of a delegate. Simply add the type of the parameter and a parameter object (if you want the parameter to be nullable) and use the Invoke Method method (the only one which returns a delegate). Like this: var method = Expression.Lambda(Expression.New(typeof(Action)) .Body .Constant(null), parameterExpression); method(); A: There is no reflection in the System.Reflection.Emit namespace. You can construct Function objects and invoke them, but they're not reflection in the sense of being able to inspect a class at runtime. I'm not sure why you would want to, but here is a way to do it with reflection. You can't do it with a single expression, but the expression tree query syntax lets you build an expression tree which can be evaluated to a delegate.
