Live to support the films you love. Wotzit? In the summer of 2012, Gemma Hunt, from Leeds, England, discovered she was about to become a mummy through accidental conception. As a single mother working in the NHS, she and her boyfriend had made a pact that their journey to parenthood would be long, stretched over several years, so that Gemma knew she could always fall back on helping to support them, as a parent herself, if she got pregnant. She knew she had a high risk of double ovulation and wanted to track her ovulations at a time that made her most fertile. She was given two ovulation tests a year to track her fertility, combined with checking her basal body temperature, taking a daily spot test and charting her cervical secretions. But this was all occurring three years into her process, and out of nowhere she found herself, at 34, with a diagnosis of Aspergillosis, a disease in which she develops an allergic reaction to the fungus Aspergillus, and started to notice her symptoms were worsening. It was to her horror that she was forced to decide whether she wanted to continue with the pregnancy she so desperately wanted, with only two ovulation tests, three charting tools and a temperature device to guide her - as a patient with a fatal illness. Gemma says: "I was overwhelmed and shocked. I had just turned my 30th birthday and had already seen friends and family drop dead at a much younger age than me. I feared I might die at any moment too, and if that did happen it would cause so much heartache for my kids. I felt totally helpless because without testing, you don't know where you stand. People need to be more aware of how vital testing is. I was so scared because if I was diagnosed with this, I would have to have an abortion and I didn't want to. I knew I wasn't ready to be a mum and I felt I couldn't do it on my own." Taking a medical abortion Gemma's symptoms had been worsening and were starting to interfere with her work as a trauma nurse, so her GP decided it was time to tell her that she might have cervical cancer. Gemma says: "I wasn't ready to hear it, and I was totally shocked. I hadn't had any symptoms, but it was my GP, a
