of 25 wall-mounted heat exchangers following a dry cleaning machine leak. This study investigated the performance of wall-mounted heat exchangers following a leak of the cooling-water system of a dry cleaning machine. Twenty-five heat exchangers were supplied to the research partner and six were used in a 3-year long-term follow-up.

This study investigated what happened when water leaked from the cooling-water system, at what point it occurred and what was the impact on the thermal performance of the heat exchangers. During the leak investigation, parts were inspected from each heat exchanger and samples of cooling-water were taken from various points. The water temperature was measured at various locations within the heat exchanger and a thermocouple was used to measure the temperature of the wetted surface of the heat exchanger. Dry-air measurements at the testing sites, including in the vicinity of each heat exchanger, were also used to calculate surface temperatures. Dry-air temperatures generally increased by 50-90 °C, but when taking into account the different locations and ambient conditions, this increase may not be as marked as the water temperature. This study also showed that the heat exchanger tested had several leaks and that each had a differing impact on the performance of the heat exchanger. After a cooling-water leak, the temperature of wetted surfaces of the heat exchanger can vary significantly. This can have a serious influences experienced nurses' perceptions of the relationship between work and life balance and to develop an evidence-based intervention to achieve a balance that is, and remains, sustainable for this group of nurses. Burnout has long been identified as an occupational risk for nurses, and work-life balance is a key concept in the development of preventive strategies and interventions to reduce burnout and its consequences. Work-life balance, however, is a poorly-defined concept with no universally accepted definition and remains a significant unmet need for nurses. A cross-sectional postal survey. A self-completion postal questionnaire was distributed to a stratified random sample of experienced nurses in Queensland, Australia (n = 1000, response rate 60.5%). Multiple regression was used to identify predictors of work-life balance, including demographic, work, occupational and personal factors, together with nurse's burnout. Paired-t tests were used to compare pre- and post-intervention scores of work-life balance. A statistically significant and positive linear relationship was found between work-life balance and burnout. Although demographic factors such as work hours were not found to be significantly associated with work-life balance, occupational factors such as interprofessional collaboration and communication were. These were more strongly associated with work-life balance than burnout. A positive

To identify what
