In the spleen, the terminal differentiation of CD4+ and CD8+ T cells occurs rapidly over a 2-h time course that is preceded by an abrupt increase in size. This cell-cycle arrest is controlled by clock genes expressed by nuclear-localized circadian oscillators in CD4+ and CD8+ thymocytes and peripheral T cells. To compare the clock functions between these T-cell subsets, a DNA looping system was used to recruit putative clock proteins, such as PERIOD1 (PER1), CLOCK, BMAL1, and BMAL1-related protein (BMAL1r), to a luciferase reporter plasmid. Results from three different approaches indicated that naive CD4+ and CD8+ T cells from thymus and peripheral blood had similar abilities to activate the clock. Absence of clock activity was also found to have no significant effects on thymocyte development or sorting requirements for their positive selection. Since maturation and survival rates of naive CD4+ and CD8+ T cells in lymphopenia are similar, the terminal differentiation and survival rate become equivalent in both T-cell lineages. Collectively, these findings suggest that the clock functions in T-cell differentiation are similar, and the minor effect caused by the differences in clock activity seems to be sufficient for the distinction between central and peripheral naive T cells.Q: How to convert year
