R. U. 2 (09.2012).rar[The use of anesthetics in child neurosurgery. Anesthetic studies on clinical, electroencephalographic, and biochemical parameters (author's transl)]. It is discussed to what extent the perioperative care of neurosurgical children presents problems, particularly in the light of experimental studies. The authors draw attention to the risk of untoward effects of anaesthesia on children with impaired brain function, particularly with epilepsy. They suggest the use of oxylong administration of anaesthetics for peripheral venous catheterization in children. Only anaesthetics with rapid onset time, such as sodium thiopental, should be used for intravenous induction of anaesthesia. It is then best to administer inhalational anaesthetics as a subsequent therapy in order to avoid additional effects on their postoperatively unstable EEG. An adequate dosage of anticonvulsive drugs is important. Hyperventilation, use of inotropic agents and muscle relaxants, and the prophylactic dosage of diazepam may lead to neurologic complications.1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a method and apparatus for rapidly homogenizing an aqueous liquid or colloidal suspension, or the like, so as to obtain a uniform concentration of the suspended solids therein. 2. Description of the Prior Art In the general practice of water or sewage treatment, it is usually advantageous to carry out the treatment process at a uniform concentration of the suspended solids. During the process of either of these treatments, the water is passed through a tank or other vessel containing the media or apparatus for treating the water, and the suspension tends to settle in such tank or vessel to form an impermeable bottom layer or strata consisting of the suspended solids. It is then generally necessary to dig out the settled solids in order to provide access to the upper levels of the media, so that the suspension may be maintained in a flowing state. For example, large amounts of solids can accumulate at the bottom of the tank or vessel in the course of treating water, or sewage, and in order to make it possible to maintain the flowing liquid at the desired concentration of suspended solids in it, the tank or vessel must be dug out to provide such solids removal. In order to avoid the necessity for such digging out of the tank or vessel, and for the loss of capacity of the tank or vessel due to its removal, there have been many proposals to utilize apparatus for
