I want to have a public git repository with comments, that is: create a public repository create a branch called "comment" make a new commit with a comment delete the comment When someone clones the repo with a git-web interface or something similar, they should only see the last commit. How do I do that with the git repository? A: Do as you said: create a public repository create a branch called "comment" make a new commit with a comment delete the comment With these steps, you commit the step 3 on top of the previous commit. It will remain there until you revert or reset it. I want to have a public git repository with comments Git provides a way for storing comments, with different "levels". You can store the comments under the branch comment You can store the comments under the branch tip You can store comments under the individual commits. A convenient way to do this is to use the branch tracking mechanism: $ git branch comment my-branch $ git checkout my-branch At this point you can add and commit a message for the commit you're working on: $ git commit -a -m "I've added my comment" Then delete your comment: $ git
